[Accessed 8 June 2015] I'm pleased and humbled to be able to share my thoughts on the work of Dr. Frank Pasquale. The work I do is both experimental and exploratory, and I hope that some of my writing here will assist others that are exploring, reading, or working with this work and its possible applications. We have had such an intense interest in this in the last few years that I recently came into contact with a group of folks in the field (in one case in Boston and in another outside of it!) who brought me into contact with another group of folks in the field. We started seeing what we now call the "Pepe group," so that meant not only me but many of the folks that came out of that community as well as many others that I encountered in my research as well as among the community as well. The work that I do is experimental since it's exploratory, and the result of doing this experimentation is that for the past few years, I have been finding new research that I think is valuable for a better understanding of what these ancient civilizations looked like – not only for us to learn more about the civilizations of our own times but for us to learn about others who may have more insight or have knowledge that is complementary to what we learn about here.. 's Economics, vol. 1 (2000) [3] "This is not just a microeconomic paper. It explains why it matters to pay attention to economic theory in the public arena. A book like this is valuable to the next generation. It can be used against economics and other disciplines where there is a tendency to give the short shrift to economists' findings in general, and economics itself less so." <http://civildude.org/economics/1.html> [4] "We are living in an era where economic policies are being developed to deal with human suffering and injustice. We must not fall prey to the fallacy that the only way to deal with the problems facing contemporary society is through increased taxation. Rather, we must focus on how to better benefit ourselves and our fellow human beings." <http://www.chicagotribune.com/topics/economics-and-social-policy/economics-chicago-matt-whittle-nix-t-his-happiness-thesis-and-why-taxation-isnt-the-only-way-to-deal-with-human-abuses-1012426> [5] "The theory behind the economy is rooted in human psychology known as reciprocity. The theory gives priority to the good of all, so everyone in the group gets priority. If someone doesn't benefit from his cooperation with a fellow member, he has some incentive to act against that person." http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Receptive_social_principles [6] "If this is a 'scientific' theory of society, it may be that the best way to determine how this would play out could be to test a large sample of 'unemployed' individuals in a way that provides more data. The same is true in regards to the concept of a social class. If there is a difference between the 'best' group of individuals in society--those who are more fortunate relative to others--and those who are less so, and if the differences aren't statistically significant, then a simple measure of the average group difference could provide the information." http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Social_differences [7] "The world is a dangerous place in which people die young or early, and so it is important to make sure we intervene with those we can help. But it is also crucial to be aware how vulnerable individuals to extreme poverty are, and to determine ways to , Andrew W. Fisk , Rohan Sharma , and Mark Loughman 2012 ; Vol. 8 Issue 21, p. 939 e13..
